

Torah Reflections on Pesach

15-22 Nisan 5779 April 20-27, 2019
(First seder April 19th)

As the night of the first seder draws near, our thoughts may turn toward the symbols and memories we associate with the festival.

We recognize that not everyone in the Jewish community will be able to celebrate Passover this year with friends and family in a home environment. Perhaps especially for those who are facing the holiday in a hospital bed or in an institution away from home, the imagery of liberation and the yearning for an exodus from our mitzrayim—our places of struggle and oppression (mitzrayim means “narrow straits” and is also the Hebrew name for the land of Egypt) may hold newfound resonance.

Now may be an opportune time to visualize a seder plate, replete with the central symbols of Passover that are discussed through the reading of the haggadah: the shank bone, the matzah, the maror (bitter herbs), the roasted egg, the parsley or other spring greens, the sweet charoset, and also the salt water. All these items represent aspects of the Israelites’ experience in journeying from Egyptian slavery to freedom.

Taken together, everything on the seder plate can represent different parts of ourselves as well. What new questions, and what ancient wisdom are embodied in these ritual foods, for us to discover and ponder at this season?

The egg represents the cycle of life and birth; and the parsley symbolizes spring’s reappearance. What is yet growing in me, or what do I find renewed within myself?

The salt water asks: what has been the source of my tears?

The roasted shank bone is a reminder of the sacrificial animal whose blood was used to mark the Jewish doorposts. It allows us to ask: what are the risks I have taken, and what are the sacrifices I am willing to make, in the name of greater freedom?

We all carry the bitterness of maror within us. Where and how am I bitter? The charoset complements the maror. What brings me sweetness and joy? Matzah symbolizes our affliction and impoverishment at the beginning of the seder. We turn to the same food as the quintessential symbol of our liberation and redemption by the seder’s end. What elements of the experience of my illness or my broken-heartedness have been openings for healing? What elements might yet be redeemed or transformed into gateways for loving connection?

May the questions, the reflections, and the answers raised during the Passover season be a source of growth and learning, comfort and healing.
